EUROPE IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

Holland Next to England, in the Value of Her Possessions.

The Pacific ocean, westward of Hawaii and the Marquesas, is like a federation of European nations on Asiatic soil, united by the free commerce of the seas. The nations vary in size, strength and importance, as the States of Europe or of the American Union. Great Britain commands the field with a landed area of nearly 3,500,000 square miles. Poor Spain's once magnificent empire is shrunk to less than fifty square miles, a smaller total than belongs to black King George of the Tongas. Holland, the country from which emanated the doughty Boers, owns over 25,000 square miles, settled with nearly eight times as many people as inhabit the large area owned by Great Britain. Germany, the new civilization among the nations, has dominance over more than 100,000 square miles and about as many people as there are miles. France, with less than one-tenth of Germany's land, is at some of the most important points of strategy and at the point of greatest travel. Several independent States lie in the midst of this federation, as Switzerland does in Europe; several others in the unhappy, suzerained position of the Transvaal in South Africa.

If all the islands could be put into a continuous body of land they would form a most heterogeneous empire. They would include, in addition to European peoples Tongas, Holland, the country from which systems, a tangle of aborigines, a confusion of savages and semi-civilized cultivators of soil and commonwealth; an emporium of products more diversified than a bazaar on a midway place; a mystery of traditions as inexplicable as the origin of the American Indians. Profoundly forested in the Dutch East Indies, the islands become in western Australia more barren than the lava beds of eastern Oregon and more irredeemable than the uppermost wilds of British Columbia. Fertile, balmy and luxurious in the beautiful lands of New Zealand, Fiji, Samoa and Tahiti, they are transformed into uninhabitable beds of struggle in the guano covered or copra-producing dots on the map north and east of a line drawn from the Philippines to New Guinea and through Samoa to the Society Islands.
